Tropical Plant Seasonality within the Selling Season

Everybody wants to have full and vibrant plants to sell for Mother's Day. Unfortunately, that's not always the way tropical plants work. When you buy plants direct from a grower, the transition to life in the Northeast can be a challenge. In order to successfully ship tropical plants to colder climates, the growers frequently take certain precautions and pruning steps to help the plants with the transition. The result can be that the heads of some of these plants (especially some tree forms and standards) may look smaller than you expected when they arrive. This is not a sign that there is a problem with the plant or a quality issue. The plants will begin to grow rapidly and fill out when exposed to the warmer weather and the sun. Please consider this BEFORE ordering plants directly from the grower. Your Green Goods Direct sales rep will be more than happy to help guide you or answer your questions.

Assortments

Please NOTE that many of the plants are sold as an assortment.

What this means is that there is NO GUARANTEE that you will receive equal ratios of all types advertised. The plants contained within the assortment are subject to seasonal availability. As the season progresses, the available "assortment" will change.

Green Goods Direct and the Grower will make every attempt to provide you with the greatest plant mix.

Please be aware of this possibility when determining your shipping date or placing an order.

It is remotely possible that the plants available at the time of shipping may be of only one type or color.

Shipping Tropical Plants Direct

Receiving your tropical plants direct from a grower is a great cost savings decision for any garden center. It will allow you to increase your margins and make you more profitable. However, it's a slightly different experience than getting tropical plants from your local re-wholesaler or nursery down the road. Tropical plants travel a great distance to reach your garden center.

Tropical Plants need a short period of time to "rebound" from the long trip. They are rarely retail ready when they first arrive. Ethylene accumulation in the truck or simple shock can cause leaves to yellow and drop. DO NOT BE ALARMED this is normal and should not last long.

Unpacking Tropical Plants

Move the plants into the greenhouse or other warm location as soon as possible and open the boxes or paper sleeves. Leave the tropical plants inside the boxes/sleeves for a few hours to minimize shock. Later in the day, unpack and water the plants. To avoid breaking branches, cut around the base of the carton and lift it off the plants by its lid.

Light

When the tropical plants first arrive, do not place them in direct sunlight for at least a week or so.

Darkness

If you asked the average person if he or she would like to be wrapped in a paper bag, crammed into a truck, and forced to ride in the dark over bumpy roads for 24-72 hours, you might find very few people signing up for the trip. The funny thing is that tropical plants don't like it either and rarely volunteer for the experience. Keep this in mind when your plants arrive. The darkness and time in the truck will cause your tropical plants to become stressed. It will take a little bit of time for them to shake off the effects of the trip and be ready to sell.

Temperature Changes

Tropical plants are sensitive and vulnerable to temperature change. They don't like moving from their nice, warm home to their new (often cooler) residence. The sudden temperature changes from shipping will cause most tropical plants temporary stress. Changes in temperatures or drafts can cause the leaves to drop.

This is normal and the plants will rebound after a week or so.
